1998) and the in vitro studies (Lippman et al. 1998) suggest that the in vivo effects of cigarette smoke may be mediated by the formation of reactive intermediates that are capable of forming covalent adducts with DNA. The in vivo studies have shown that the formation of these adducts is dependent on the dose of cigarette smoke and the duration of exposure. The in vitro studies have shown that the formation of these adducts is dependent on the concentration of cigarette smoke and the duration of exposure. The in vivo studies have also shown that the formation of these adducts is dependent on the metabolic activation of cigarette smoke. The in vitro studies have also shown that the formation of these adducts is dependent on the metabolic activation of cigarette smoke. The in vivo studies have also shown that the formation of these adducts is dependent on the metabolic activation of cigarette smoke.
